Not illustrated. 1757 edition. Excerpt: ... happy as to be obscure, who writ against the Religion of their Country. Toland, the Author of the Atheists Liturgy, called Pantheisticon, was a spy in pay to Lord Oxford. Tindal was author of the Rights of the Christian Church, and Christianity as old as the Creation. He also wrote an abusive pamphlet against Earl S, which was suppressed, while yet in MS. by an eminent person, when out of the ministry, to whom he shewed it, expecting his approbation: This Doctor afterwards published the same piece, mutatis mutandis, against that very person. Ver. 400. Christ's no kingdom, &c. This is said by Curl, Key to Dune, to allude to a sermon of a reverend Bishop. Ver. 405. As what it Datchmatu &c It is a common and foolish mistake, that a ludicrous parody of A grave and celebrated passage is a ridicule of that passage. The reader therefore, if he will, may call this a parody of the authors own sublime Similitude in the Essay on Man, Ep. iv. As the small pebble, &c. but will any body therefore suspect the One to be a ridicule of the other? A ridicule indeed there is in every parody: but when the image is transferred from one subject to another, and the subject is not a poem burlesqued (which Scriblerus hopes the reader will distinguish from a burlesque poem) there the ridicule falls not on the thing imitated, but imitating. Thus, for instance, what Dulness dropt among her sons imperfect Like motion from one circle to the rest: So from the mid-moist the nutation spreads Round and more round, o'er all they? of heads. 410 At last Centlivre felt her voice to fail, Motteux himself unfinished left his tale, Boyer the State, and Law the Stage gave o'er, Morgan and Mandevil could prate no
