What do you mean by that, sir? retorted Butler. You must mistake me for some other person. My name is Reuben Butler, preacher of the gospel. I ken that weel enough, said the turnkey. Well, then, if you know me, I have a right to know from you in return, what warrant you have for detaining me; that, I know, is the right of every British subject. Warrant? said the jailor,-- the warrants awa to Libberton wi twa sheriff officers seeking ye. If ye had staid at hame, as honest men should do, ye wad hae seen the warrant; but if ye come to be incarcerated of your ain accord, wha can help it, my jo? So I cannot see Effie Deans, then, said Butler; and you are determined not to let me out? Troth will I no, neighbour, answered the old man, doggedly; as for Effie Deans, yell hae enough ado to mind your ain business, and let her mind hers; and for letting you out, that maun be as the magistrate will determine. And fare ye weel for a bit, for I maun see Deacon Sawyers put on ane or twa o the doors that your quiet folk broke down yesternight, Mr. Butler. There was something in this exquisitely provoking, but there was also something darkly alarming. To be imprisoned, even on a false accusation, has something in it disagreeable and menacing even to men of more constitutional courage than Butler had to boast; for although he had much of that resolution which arises from a sense of duty and an honourable desire to discharge it, yet, as his imagination was lively, and his frame of body delicate, he was far from possessing that cool insensibility to danger which is the happy portion of men of stronger health, more firm nerves,...
